Course Description: Research has outlined the benefits of a Recovery-Oriented Systems of Care model as an effective model in supporting individuals to overcome substance use problems and disorders. Based on the understanding that recovery has many pathways and is an individualized process, Recovery-Oriented Systems of Care provide an empowering environment made of program and service specific elements to support and sustain recovery processes. This interactive course provides an overview of the framework and foundational components for a Recovery-Oriented Systems of Care environment. Discussions will also include tools for organizational self-assessment, essential provider perspectives and skills, and tips to developing an implementation plan to align current infrastructure toward a recovery-enabling model.
